

Kids learn about being entrepreneurial at Certified Megamall

Around Aruba there were dozens of flea markets taking place during the celebration of Reina Beatrix's birthday on Monday, but the one at the Certified Megamall was especially for kids. The mall operators give children that want to clean out their closet and sell their used toys and clothing a booth for free, while commercial vendors must pay.

Ingrid Werleman, organizer of the event for Certified feels that the flea market gives children a chance to learn about doing business and encourages initiative and common sense. A surprising number of kids like the idea of turning their old toys into cash, and learned the value of the barter deal with other children that were will to exchange toys.

Some children found the assistance of their parents invaluable in this endeavor, though quite a few showed a natural talent for salesmanship, and could handle it quite well on their own, THANK YOU!!

By manning their booths and making sure their possessions were well maintain for resale, the children profited by the lesson of the day with far more than just some change in their pockets!
